At first there was darkness. A cold bleak wash of nothing, that found itself spread out across an even bigger void. The emptiness of it all would have been unbearable had there been anything there to bear it. As gases ebbed and swirled into life, so they swirled and ebbed into each other. The universe was created by the simple act of attraction. It decided to be, and so it was. These swirls danced like twin flames around a timeless universe. A colossal canvas upon which all manner of thoughts and people and feelings could eventually paint their picture. But in this moment, there was simply gas. Blue and orange mists, balls of delight wiggled into each others path and seemingly fled out. But never the less leaving a remnant of themselves inside one another. Always leaving a trail. Forever losing part of what they were to become what they are.
